Occasionally a small amount of contrast agent, gadodiamide, is necessary to address specific questions on the MR scan. It is different from x-ray contrast agents. Gadolinium based contrast material is given through a small needle placed into a vein, usually on the inside of your elbow or the back of your hand. Gadodiamide, which is FDA approved, is considered very safe; but, please let us know if you have had kidney problems. Rarely, there are mild sensations such as headache or nausea.

If you have any questions, please ask the MR technologist or the attending radiologist.

I have answered the preceding questions to the best of my knowledge. I consent to have intravenous contrast material used for my MR scan, if needed. Height: _____ Weight: _____
